OVERVIEW

China

China's independent foreign policy line, proclaimed in 1981-82, places a renewed emphasis on China's ties with the Third World. The Middle East/West Asia region is important to China both strategically and as a part of its foreign policy toward the Third World. Because all the countries in the Middle East/West Asia region, whether poverty-stricken Ethiopia or oil-rich Kuwait, belong to the Third World, Beijing's relations with the region exemplify trends in its Third World policy. With the exception of India, China does not perceive either a direct threat or a rivalry from the countries of the region, but rather is concerned that a conflict there could escalate to involve the superpowers. Beijing also fears that Soviet expansion in the region would aid Moscow's long-term plans to encircle China and achieve global dominance. Other aspects of China's foreign policy which are evident in recent Chinese relations with the Middle East and West Asia include:

- o Chinese criticism of both United States and Soviet policies;
- o Chinese willingness to pursue relations with governments and parties regardless of their social systems or ideology;
- o the promotion of stability and world peace in order to achieve economic modernization;
- o an emphasis on "mutual benefit" in economic and trade relations, whereby joint ventures and business contracts take precedence over grants and aid;
- o the continued use of cultural ties to promote goodwill and solidarity, with a new emphasis on economic ties between Chinese Muslims and Islamic countries; and
- o an expanded Chinese role in the international arms trade.

During 1985, delegations exchanged between China and the Middle East/West Asia region were predominantly economic in nature, comprising over 40 percent of the total visits (see chronology and statistical summary). Although Beijing still offers traditional forms of aid such as disaster relief and medical teams to poorer countries, including Ethiopia, Somalia, Sudan, and Bangladesh, recent Chinese economic ties with the region more commonly are based on trade, business contracts, and joint ventures. At the beginning of 1985, Chinese Vice Minister of Foreign Economic Relations and Trade Lu Xuejian extolled the advantages of Third World cooperation (also known as South-South cooperation), where countries involved supply each other with resources and technology the other lacks. He cited a three-way Chinese-Kuwaiti-Tunisian joint venture initiated in early January 1985 as an example: "China has synthetic ammonia and sulphuric acid, Kuwait has funds, and Tunisia abounds in phosphate; therefore, a phosphate fertilizer plant.¹ China also has been successful in "exporting" Chinese engineers and technicians to work in the Third World. The Middle East ranks first in the geographic regions for which China provides contract labor, with North Africa second.² Chinese construction and labor companies appear to be gaining on their competitors, even the formerly predominant South Koreans.³

In its military relations with the Middle East/West Asia region in 1985, China continued the trend of recent years as it reportedly became the world's fifth largest arms merchant, after the Soviet Union, the United States, France, and Britain.⁴ At the same time, Chinese secrecy about its clients, along with unconfirmed reports (strongly denied by Beijing) of Chinese military dealings with Israel, Iran, Iraq, and Afghan resistance fighters, created an ambiguous impression of Chinese military involvement in the region. In addition, the question of possible Chinese nuclear cooperation with Pakistan and Iran, also vehemently denied by China, continued to be controversial. The most remarkable new development in China's military relations with the Middle East/West Asia region in 1985 was the two-ship Chinese naval visit to Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Bangladesh in December; it was the first such visit to any foreign country since 1949.

Another change in China's relations with the Middle East/West Asia region in 1985 was that Beijing appeared to take a slightly more active role in the region's political affairs. In April 1985, China received an Arab League delegation to discuss the Iran-Iraq War and in May, a joint Jordanian-Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) delegation to confer on the Palestinian issue. The 1985 trend toward more explicit involvement in the region culminated in Chinese Minister of Foreign Affairs Wu Xueqian's December tour of Iraq, Syria, Jordan, Egypt, the United Arab Emirates (UAE), and Bangladesh. During the trip, Wu discussed the Gulf War and the Middle East issue with the leaders of each country and promised China's support in the United Nations Security Council for a UN-sponsored conference on the Middle East. Beijing's slight increase in political activity in the Middle East and West Asia is unlikely, however, to alter its basically low profile in the region. China will continue to urge Arab unity as the best hope for solving regional problems without outside interference.

AFRICA-HORN

Following the general trend for Chinese exchanges with the Middle East/West Asia region, the majority of interactions between China and the Horn of Africa in 1985 were economic in nature--relief donations to Ethiopia, Somalia, and Sudan, cooperative construction projects in Kenya and Somalia, and a high-level economic delegation and loan agreement with Kenya. The only reported exchange between China and Djibouti during the year was a visit in March by the Chinese Minister of Urban and Rural Construction Rui Xingwen. Chinese relations with Ethiopia continued to improve as they have since 1983, as part of China's policy of furthering ties with other nations regardless of social or ideological differences. In March, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) made its first official contact with the Workers Party of Ethiopia. In July, Chinese State Councillor Chen Muhua attended the World Conference on the United Nations Decade for Women held in Kenya and in December, a CCP friendship delegation went to Mogadishu to take part in celebrations of the 25th anniversary of Sino-Somali relations. No military delegations were reported between China and any country in the Horn of Africa in 1985.

The number of delegations exchanged between China and Sudan decreased in 1985 in comparison with previous years, probably due to internal changes in Sudan following the April coup d'etat there. Although the Secretary General of the disbanded Sudanese Socialist Union Party, Muhammad 'Abd al-Gadir 'Umar, happened to be visiting China in early April immediately before the coup, China was quick to congratulate the new leadership on assuming power. Moreover, Chinese commentary on the coup was favorable,⁵ indicating that relations between the two countries were not significantly strained. In addition, a Sudanese military delegation was expected to visit China in early 1986.

AFRICA-NORTH

Chinese exchanges with North Africa in 1985 were primarily economic, comprising half the total number of delegations. A prime demonstration of Chinese economic interest in the region was Vice Premier Tian Jiyun's October-November trip to Algeria, Tunisia, Morocco, and Libya (every country in the region except Egypt) to further economic and technical cooperation. During the trip, Tian signed two agreements on economic and technical cooperation with Algeria, minutes of talks on cooperation and agreements to expand trade with Tunisia, a trade agreement with Morocco, and a summary of talks on cooperation in trade, health, and construction with Libya. An indication of China's cordial ties with Tunisia was Tunisian President Habib Bourguiba's decorating Chinese Vice Premier Tian with a medal of honor during his visit.

In addition to the agreements signed during Tian Jiyun's tour, a sister-city agreement was signed between Kunming and Rabat in Morocco in May, a medical team protocol with Tunisia in July, the first Sino-Libyan cultural cooperation agreement in August, and the first Sino-Algerian radio and television cooperation agreement in December. Chinese relations with North Africa basically remained the same, although relations with Morocco improved slightly through the resumption of party ties between the CCP and the Progress Party of Morocco in August, after 20 years' interruption.

In 1985 Egypt remained China's closest friend in North Africa. Numerous economic exchanges included the third meeting of the Sino-Egyptian electric-power cooperation committee, a media cooperation agreement, and banking and technical cooperation documents, all concluded in April, and a long-term trade agreement and protocol signed in August. Egypt also experienced the largest number of cultural exchanges between China and North Africa in 1985. For many years, China has made use of cultural ties with Chinese Muslims to further relations with the Middle East/West Asia region, but now at times with an added twist: China specifically promotes economic agreements between Islamic countries and Chinese Muslims. An example is the September agreement whereby Chinese Muslims will work on an Egyptian land-reclamation project. Chinese Minister of Foreign Affairs Wu Xueqian made Egypt the only North African stop on his Middle Eastern tour in December, demonstrating the importance China attaches to political ties with Egypt.

Sino-Egyptian military ties continued to develop in 1985, with Cairo's order of 100 F-6 fighter planes from China reported in June. In addition, a Chinese JIANGHU-Class frigate was formally accepted into the Egyptian Navy in April, and Egypt continued to assemble Chinese XI'AN F-7 planes under a previously arranged licensing agreement.⁶ An interesting military interaction in 1985 which received very little publicity was Egypt's purported cancellation of an arms deal with China after discovering that some of the items contained Israeli-made components. A report of the cancellation of a $500-million purchase of Chinese tanks, personnel carriers, and communications equipment appeared in October without specifying which items had Israeli-made parts.⁷ It seems likely that the items which Egypt found objectionable may have been Israeli-designed cannons, gun turrets, or sighting and fire control equipment, all of which were previously reported to be found on Chinese tanks.⁸

ARABIAN PENINSULA

China's relations with the Arabian Peninsula are primarily economic and cultural, and include limited ties with nations with which Beijing lacks diplomatic relations: Bahrain, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia. During his December 1985 visit to the United Arab Emirates (UAE), Chinese Minister of Foreign Affairs Wu Xueqian expressed China's eagerness to establish relations with the three aforementioned nations, but said "we can wait if these countries still have difficulties in setting up diplomatic ties with China."⁹ In 1985 a sports team from Qatar visited China, but no exchanges were reported between China and Bahrain. Economic and cultural relations between China and Saudi Arabia, however, expanded noticeably. Over 2,100 Chinese Muslims made the Pilgrimage to Mecca in July, the largest group to date, and there were reports that Saudi Arabia was financing the construction of a mosque in Beijing. In addition, Saudi trade delegations visited the Ningxia Hui Autonomous Region twice in 1985 to discuss economic cooperation, another example of Beijing's effort to promote economic ties between Muslim areas of China and Islamic countries. In November, Chinese Vice Premier Yao Yilin met separately with an unnamed Qatari leader and Saudi Deputy Prime Minister and Crown Prince 'Abdallah bin 'Abd al-'Aziz Al Sa'ud while visiting Oman. A Chinese broadcast called the Yao-Sa'ud meeting "a new page in the annals of relationship between China and Saudi Arabia."¹⁰ Although China appears hopeful about the prospects for Sino-Saudi diplomatic relations,¹¹ it is uncertain whether Riyadh is willing to abandon its close relationship with Taipei in favor of formal diplomatic relations with Beijing.

Of all the Arabian Peninsula states, China's relations with Kuwait are the friendliest. Twice as many delegations were exchanged in 1985 between China and Kuwait than with any other country in the region. Important exchanges included a January visit to China by the Kuwaiti Minister of Oil and Finance 'Ali al-Khalifa al-Athbi Al Sabah, State Councillor Zhang Jingfu's and Minister of Petroleum Industry Teng Ke's separate visits to Kuwait in March, a high-level Kuwaiti banking delegation to China in October, and Vice Premier Yao Yilin's trip to Kuwait in November. In addition to agreements on media cooperation, joint ventures, and loans, during Yao's visit the two countries signed an agreement guaranteeing mutual investments. Also, regular air service was inaugurated between China and Kuwait in July and regular full-service container cargo shipping began in November.

Vice Premier Yao Yilin visited Oman and the United Arab Emirates as well as Kuwait in November 1985, attending National Day celebrations in Oman and signing China's first economic, technical, and trade agreement with the UAE. While Chinese exchanges with Oman decreased slightly from previous years, relations with the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY) and the Yemen Arab Republic (YAR) remained fairly constant. Beijing appeared to pay particular attention to the UAE, with which diplomatic relations were established only in late 1984. In 1985, Chinese Minister of Urban and Rural Construction Rui Xingwen, Minister of Foreign Affairs Wu Xueqian, and Vice Premier Yao Yilin made official visits to Abu Dhabi. Premier Zhao Ziyang's June stopover visit to the UAE was the highest-level visit between China and any country on the Arabian Peninsula in 1985.

LEVANT

China continues to express concern about the war-torn Levant region in an abundance of statements on the Arab-Israeli conflict. Because of the strife in the region and the fact that China has no diplomatic relations with Israel, fewer exchanges were reported between China and the region than any other part of the Middle East or West Asia. The key points of China's official policy toward the Levant region are:

- o opposition to Israel's "aggression and expansion" supported by the United States;
- o insistence that Israel withdraw from the Arab territories it has occupied since 1967;
- o support for Palestinian rights and Palestinian solidarity under the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO);
- o advocacy of Arab unity behind the Palestinian cause in order to achieve peace in the Middle East; and
- o belief that all countries in the region, including the PLO, have the right to exist.

China welcomed Chairman of the PLO Executive Committee Yasir Arafat to Beijing in May as part of a Jordanian-PLO delegation. Arafat called China a "true friend" and later claimed it was "inconceivable" that the Middle East issue could be solved without Soviet and Chinese participation.¹²

There were no delegations exchanged in 1985 with Lebanon. China maintains a diplomatic presence in Lebanon, however, and the new Chinese Ambassador, after his arrival in Beirut in August, reaffirmed Beijing's support for the Lebanese Government and people in their struggle against "Israeli aggression."¹³ The only Chinese exchange with Syria in 1985 was the first visit by a Chinese foreign minister to Damascus in 20 years--Minister of Foreign Affairs Wu Xueqian's December visit. It is unusual that the only exchange with a country during the year would be by such a high-level official, perhaps an indication of China's increased interest in becoming more actively involved in the resolution of the Middle East conflict in 1985.

Wu Xueqian also held discussions on the Arab-Israeli conflict during his visit to Jordan. In 1985 China's relations with Jordan continued to improve, with Deputy Prime Minister of Education 'Abd al-Wahhab al-Magali's joint visit to China with the PLO in May, the first meeting of the Sino-Jordanian Joint Committee on Economic, Trade, and Technical Cooperation, and Jordanian Chief of Staff Lieutenant General Abu Talib's visit to China, both in November. China also is expanding economic cooperation with Jordan through such projects as sending around 2,500 construction workers to Jordan and jointly building hotels in South China.¹⁴

China's policy toward Israel is the most controversial aspect of Beijing's relations with the Levant region. Beijing and Tel Aviv have no diplomatic relations and as recently as December 1985, China declared it would not establish such relations "so long as Israel continued its policy of aggression and expansion."¹⁵ During his December visit to Egypt, Minister of Foreign Affairs Wu Xueqian clarified China's position on Israel, drawing a distinction between the Israeli authorities and the Israeli people. He said that personal and academic contacts at international conferences were permissible, and that Israelis would be allowed to attend such events in China.¹⁶

There have been increasingly frequent and more credible reports of much more substantive Sino-Israeli dealings, however, since the early 1980s. In 1985, more than 60 Israeli companies were said to be involved in Chinese agricultural and construction projects, and Israeli experts may have entered China on Israeli passports for the first time.¹⁷ The crux of the controversy lies in reports of extensive arms deals between China and Israel, which Beijing consistently refutes as "entirely groundless."¹⁸ According to a January 1985 report, Israel signed military contracts with China worth over $3 billion and Israeli advisors may have been attached to several Chinese military units to provide training on Israeli equipment.¹⁹ Although China claims these purported arms deals are only malicious rumors aimed at undermining Chinese-Arab relations, at least two considerations offer a plausible rationale for Chinese interest in Israeli military equipment and experience: certain export controls on weapons sales could be circumvented by clandestine sales, especially through third parties, and the People's Liberation Army (PLA) could benefit tremendously from Israeli first-hand combat knowledge of Soviet-made weapons.¹⁹ Perhaps confirmation of Sino-Israeli military cooperation will come to light only in a piecemeal fashion, the way the apparently Israeli-designed gun barrel spotted on a Chinese tank in the October 1984 National Day parade lent credibility to reports of such contacts.

SELECTED SOUTH ASIAN COUNTRIES

In 1985 China maintained cordial ties with Bangladesh and Sri Lanka and made government, economic, cultural, and military exchanges. China provided Bangladesh with relief aid following the natural disasters of the summer, Bangladeshi President Hussain Mohamed Ershad visited China in July, and in December, Beijing and Dacca signed the largest barter protocol ever signed by Bangladesh and a foreign country. Two other path-breaking exchanges in December were Wu Xueqian's official visit, the first by a Chinese Foreign Minister to Bangladesh, and a Chinese port call at Chittagong, part of the first Chinese naval ship visit abroad since 1949. According to "informed sources" cited in a press report, China provided Bangladesh with an unspecified naval vessel and modified MiG-19 fighter planes, as well as spare parts and light arms in 1985.²⁰ Significant Chinese exchanges with Sri Lanka in 1985 included the January visit of State Councillor and Minister of Foreign Affairs Wu Xueqian, Sri Lankan Minister of Culture Edwin Lok Bandara Hurulle's March visit to China to sign a cultural cooperation agreement, a high-level Sri Lankan military delegation to China in July, and a United National Party delegation to Beijing in September to discuss party-to-party ties. In addition, the first session of the Sino-Sri Lankan Committee for Economic and Trade Cooperation met in Colombo in November, and two Chinese Navy ships visited Sri Lanka (as well as Pakistan and Bangladesh) on their first overseas tour in December.

In 1985, China and India continued gradually to ease their strained relations. India followed the pattern of previous years of holding more cultural and friendship exchanges with China than with any other country in the Middle East or West Asia, an indication of efforts on both sides to foster understanding and goodwill. Cultural delegations included a visit to Beijing by Nobel Peace Prize winner Mother Teresa in January, and, in March, the first Chinese Christian delegation to India since 1949. Sino-Indian trade increased, with agreements signed in March and November, and border trade resumed with Xizang in April for the first time since 1962. In December, CCP Central Committee member and newly appointed Renmin Ribao (Beijing) Director Qian Liren led a CCP delegation to India to attend the 100th anniversary of the founding of the Indian National Congress (I) Party and to discuss establishing party ties. In July, the Chinese Foreign Ministry denied Indian press reports that China was cooperating militarily with Pakistan to capture the disputed Siachin glacier area.²¹

The sixth round of Sino-Indian border talks was held in New Delhi in November in a "cordial and frank atmosphere."²² Although no breakthrough was announced on the difficult border issue itself, the negotiations were called "useful," an agreement was reached on property for the Indian Embassy in Beijing, and scientific, technical, and cultural exchanges were discussed. The talks were followed by informal meetings at a beach resort in Goa, indicating a degree of improvement. Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi met with Chinese President Li Xiannian at the United Nations in October. In November, Gandhi caused a minor stir with a statement in Parliament that India would not agree to ignore the border issue in order to develop trade with China. Both the Foreign Ministry and Gandhi later issued clarifications to the effect that programs on the border issue should occur at the same time as improvement in Sino-Indian economic and cultural relations.²³

Because animosity among South Asian nations and Pakistan only complicates China's attempts to develop friendly relations with all countries of the region, Beijing enthusiastically welcomed the formation of the South Asian Association of Regional Cooperation (SAARC) in December. Renmin Ribao (Beijing) called it "an important event of historical significance not only for South Asian countries, but also for Asia and the Third World as a whole."²⁴

SOUTHWEST ASIA

China considers the Southwest Asian region, from Turkey to Pakistan, crucial to Moscow's southward expansionist strategy, which could contribute to the eventual encirclement of China. Because of this, Beijing's ties with countries in this region are heavily influenced by military and strategic considerations. West Asia apparently emerged as the top recipient of Chinese arms in the last few years, at the same time as China's role as an arms exporter has shown phenomenal growth.²⁵ China is reported to have military dealings with every nation in the region, although there were no reports of military exchanges with Iraq in 1985, and China vehemently denies that it supplies arms to Iran, Iraq, and Afghan resistance fighters. In March, a report appeared that China had concluded an arms deal with Iran worth $1.6 billion that included SHENYANG F-6 fighter planes and T-59 tanks. Beijing and Tehran both denied the report, which appeared in a fairly questionable source, the pro-Iraqi newsletter al-Tagrir (London). In October, China refuted another report that it had sold Iran SCUD-1A and I-B surface-to-surface missiles.²⁷ Despite reports that Beijing supplies arms to both Iran and Iraq, China officially maintains a position of strict neutrality in the Gulf War. No arms sales were reported between China and Turkey, but in October, PLA Chief of the General Staff Yang Dezhi led the highest-ranking military delegation exchanged with Turkey in recent years. In addition to allegations of clandestine military sales in the region, the most controversial aspect of Chinese relations with Southwest Asia is the possibility of a nuclear relationship between China and Iran. Beijing vociferously denied all such reports, many of which appeared in conjunction with the debate in the United States throughout the year on the US-China agreement on peaceful nuclear-energy cooperation.

Exchanges with Iran featured State Councillor Zhang Jingfu's February visit to Tehran to promote economic relations and the first visit of a high-level Iranian leader to China since the Iranian Revolution, Speaker of Parliament 'Ali Akbar Hashemi-Rafsanjani's June visit to China. Presumably because of the Iran-Iraq War, for the first time, a Chinese ship en route to Iraq was detained at an Iranian port for several days in September and then released.

China continued to develop cordial ties with Iraq and Turkey. In addition to extensive economic cooperation with Iraq, including hydroelectric projects, oil wells, and dams, Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Tariq Mikhayl 'Aziz visited China in April, and, in December, Chinese Minister of Foreign Affairs Wu Xueqian visited Iraq and the third session of the Joint Sino-Iraqi Committee for Trade, Economic, and Technical Cooperation met in Baghdad. The third meeting of the Sino-Turkish Joint Economic and Trade Committee was held in March, when the two sides agreed to increase trade to $100 million in 1985. High-level Chinese exchanges with Turkey in 1985 included Prime Minister Turgut Ozal's visit to China in June, the first visit to China by a Turkish Prime Minister since the establishment of diplomatic relations in 1971; Speaker of the Turkish Grand National Assembly Necmettin Karaduman's and Deputy Prime Minister Kaya Erdem's separate visits to China; and PLA Chief of the General Staff Yang Dezhi's visit to Turkey, all in October.

Beijing continued to condemn the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and concluded that in 1985, the Afghan resistance forces gained new momentum. China donated aid to Afghan refugees in Pakistan and had only one reported interaction with the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan Government--the October return to the Chinese Embassy in Kabul of four Chinese nationals who were supposedly taken hostage by Afghan "counterrevolutionaries" while in Pakistan near the Afghan border.

China continues to foster its relationship with its closest friend in the Middle East/West Asian region, Pakistan. The foundation of Sino-Pakistani relations is military and political cooperation against the common regional threats of India and the Soviet Union. Close ties between China and Pakistan complicate Soviet actions in the region because Moscow cannot be sure to what degree China would support Pakistan in the event of a Soviet-Pakistani conflict. The strategic basis of Sino-Pakistani ties is changing slightly, however, as Sino-Soviet, Sino-Indian, and even Indo-Pakistani ties are all undergoing various degrees of limited improvement. In addition, the renewal of Western arms sales to Pakistan after the invasion of Afghanistan has made Islamabad less dependent on Chinese weapons and, as a result, Islamabad may be discontinuing new purchases of Chinese arms.²⁸ Sino-Pakistani relations are unlikely to change dramatically, however, since, as one observer put it, "both countries are genuinely grateful to each other for debts owed and realize that they have a relationship which should continue for whenever it can be mutually useful again."²⁹ Evidence that this basic stability continued in 1985 includes the June visit to Pakistan by Chinese Defense Minister Zhang Aiping, the fact that Prime Minister Mohammad Khan Junejo made China the first foreign country he visited after assuming office, and similarly, that Pakistan was the first port call on the first Chinese naval ship visit abroad since 1949.

In addition to the arms China has supplied Pakistan over the years, there is evidence that China gains access through Pakistan to arms technology that it cannot buy openly "for reverse engineering and adoption into Chinese defense production lines."³⁰ This arms technology may have included French Mirage, US Sidewinder air-to-air and TOW missiles, US F-16s, and US artillery technology.³¹

Taiwan

Taiwan's relations with the Middle East/West Asian region have declined since the late 1970s, corresponding with China's more active promotion of ties with all countries in the region, regardless of their social systems or ideology. Although Taiwan may have had other contacts with the region in 1985 which went unreported, the number of reported exchanges was much smaller than in previous years. Saudi Arabia remains the only nation in the entire region with which Taiwan has diplomatic ties. Surprisingly, there were only five exchanges reported in 1985 between Taipei and Riyadh, as opposed to six between Riyadh and Beijing. Taiwan-Saudi economic cooperation continued, and, in January, an expanded program was announced including plans for the joint development of Arabic computer software, fishery cooperation, and assistance from Taiwan for Saudi traffic management. In July, immediately after Beijing's announcement that it would send over 2,100 Chinese Muslims on a pilgrimage to Mecca, a Taiwan Government official warned that these so-called pilgrimage missions that the Chinese Communists have been dispatching to Saudi Arabia are actually Red cadres, engaging in religious united front tactics. The move . . . is an attempt to confuse the Saudi leadership and politicians by pretending that the Chinese Communists are not against Islam.³²

Taiwan is undoubtedly concerned about the possible loss of diplomatic relations with one of the few powers of any consequence which continue to recognize Taipei, and views with displeasure the increased contacts between China and Saudi Arabia.

Two trade delegations from the UAE visited Taiwan in early 1985, and an Egyptian trade delegation went to Taipei in November. The only governmental exchange between Taiwan and the region was a visit to Taiwan in December by a Bahraini Ministry of Foreign Affairs official. Police delegations from Saudi Arabia and Bahrain visited Taipei in January and June, respectively. Taiwan's only controversial contact with the region in 1985 was a case of alleged espionage by an Indian national, Rama Swaroop, who was charged in October with spying for the Federal Republic of Germany, Israel, and Taiwan. Swaroop was employed by Far East Trade Services, a Taiwan trade-promotion office in New Delhi, but Taiwan denied any involvement in the case.³³

CHRONOLOGY OF EXCHANGES: BY GEOGRAPHIC AREA AND CATEGORY

The following chronology, dealing with delegations exchanged between China and Taiwan and the Middle East/West Asia region during the period 1 January through 31 December 1985, is organized into six geographic areas:

- oAfrica-Horn
- oAfrica-North
- oArabian Peninsula
- oLevant
- oSelected South Asian Countries
- oSouthwest Asia

Although most of the chronological entries are of formal delegations exchanged by China and Taiwan with various countries in the Middle East/West Asia region, other selected contacts have also been noted when considered significant. Delegations and interchanges have been categorized as one or more of the following:

- ogovernment (G)
- omilitary (M)
- oeconomic (E)
- ocultural (C)
- opolitical (P)
- other (O)

The economic category includes medical, scientific, and technical exchanges, in addition to trade and loan delegations. Friendship delegations and groups of parliamentarians, journalists, and trade union representatives come under the "other" category. Political delegations are primarily party-to-party contacts, and cultural delegations include religious, sports, and educational groups, as well as performances and art exhibitions.

The information in the chronology was derived from a variety of open sources, the primary ones being Xinhua (New China News Agency) reports taken from the Foreign Broadcast Information Service's Daily Report: China, the periodical China Aktuell, published by the Institute for Asian Studies in Hamburg, Federal Republic of Germany, and the Summary of World Broadcasts (Gaversham Park, UK).

STATISTICAL SUMMARY

This section includes six summaries, by area and country, of the numbers and types of delegations exchanged between China or Taiwan and the countries or organizations in the Middle East/West Asia region.

The totals are based on the categorization of each delegation as either government (G), economic (E), military (M), political (P), cultural (C), or other (O). The last category includes parliamentary groups, trade union officials, journalists, friendship delegations, and groups which cannot be clearly categorized. When a delegation has a dual purpose, such as military-political, it is included under both the military and political category columns but counted only once in the total. In the time period covered by this study (1 January - 31 December 1985), there were 30 dual-purpose delegations. An example of a dual-purpose delegation is a government delegation visit during which an economic agreement is signed, considered both government (G) and economic (E).

A seventh table combines the statistics for each of the six areas under consideration and presents a summary for the entire Middle East/West Asia region.

This study is the third in a series prepared in support of estimates on the state of relations between the People's Republic of China and countries in the Middle East/West Asia region, including selected African and South Asian nations. For purposes of comparison, Taiwan's relations with the region are also addressed. The time period covered is 1 January through 31 December 1985. This volume updates the second issue (DDE-2200-211-85), published in July 1985 and covering the period 1 October 1983 to 31 December 1984. Denise Winebrenner and Karen Flanders did the word processing for the overview.
